

VÖLKEL

THREADING SOLUTIONS ■ ■ ■

Hello,

The days in Remscheid may be chilly, but at VÖLKEL, everything is still going strong. There's visible progress on our premises – and for a good reason: we're investing in safety and responsibility for our region. At the same time, this issue takes you into a technical topic many consider outdated – wrongly so. And while temperatures drop here, preparations for one of the toughest rallies in the world are heating up elsewhere.

Water Level Monitoring Station at the Morsbach – A Commitment to Our Valley

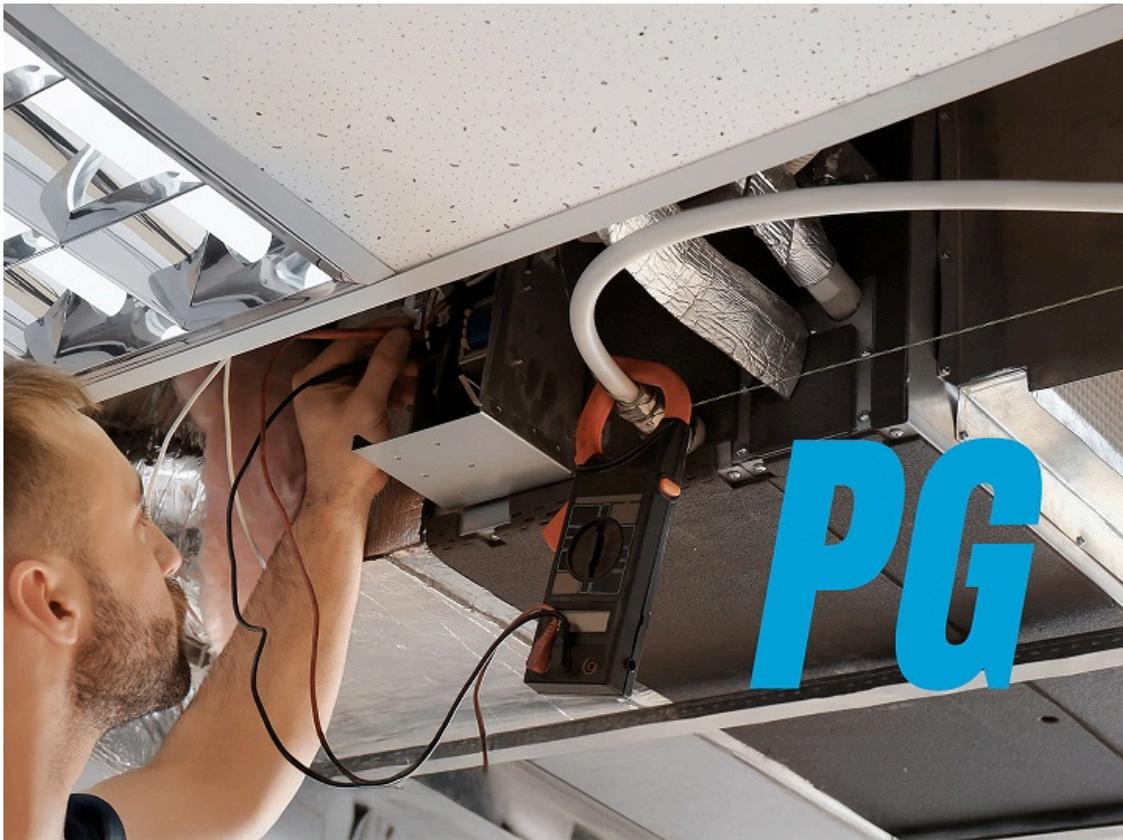

The Morsbach creek runs directly along our company grounds. Many here still remember the severe flooding in 2021, when the creek overflowed at several points in the valley and caused major damage. That's exactly why a new water level monitoring station is being built on our site – part of a broader effort to improve regional flood prevention.

The first construction steps are underway: foundation work, cabling, and technical preparation. It may still look modest, but the system will later provide important real-time data to help detect risks early. For us, this project isn't just construction. It's a clear sign that we take responsibility for our location.

PG Threads: Old Standard, New Perspective – Why They Still Matter Today

PG threads date back to a time when electrical installations followed different ideas than today. Yet the standard hasn't disappeared. Anyone active in mechanical engineering, renovation, or electrical work knows: you still come across it regularly.

Our blog breaks down why the standard still exists, where it's used today, and the technical details you need to know for proper, compliant work. You'll also find practical examples and tips on tool selection and tolerances.
